STAY WITH THE STORY_

The Fuller Project is the global newsroom dedicated to groundbreaking reporting that catalyzes positive change for women. Since we launched in 2015, our reporting has influenced new legislation, helped end life-threatening practices, and led to large scale releases of public data.

When we investigated how women were systemically left out of the World Trade Center Health Program, we stayed with the story until HHS added uterine cancer to the list of conditions the government would cover.

Hundreds of women received health care coverage because we stayed with the story.

Our reporting on Covid's threat to the maternal health system fueled the national policy discussion that led to increased funding. Three years later we are still on the story, reporting on Black maternal health and the dearth of medical research on women.

More money is dedicated to maternal health because we stayed with the story.

In Kenya, we interviewed dozens of women trash pickers about the impact of toxic chemicals on their reproductive health, pioneering research on the topic.

Negotiators for the first-ever treaty to restrict the growth of plastic pollution were armed with gender-specific data because we stayed with the story.

We believe that women's equal standing in society leads to stronger democracies, more vibrant economies, and better health. And in order for women to advance, we need to understand the issues impacting them.

We start every story with a simple question: "What about the women?" Through that lens, we see stories in places others aren't looking. We challenge the status quo, digging deep to interrogate problems and expose injustices. We're dogged in our approach, and committed to staying with the story until there are changes to the systemic and structural barriers that hold women back. Staying with the story is at the heart of our journalism.

To Stay with the Story, and catalyze positive change for women, we need your support. Our rigorous journalism runs on donations from supporters like you. Please join us as we Stay with the Story by donating today.
